Recommendation for students

The program encourages critical reflection on the fundamentals of design—asking what, where, why, when, for whom, and how—to foster purposeful and responsible decision-making. Students will work in small teams to develop proposals focused on spatial revitalization or regional planning.

Attendance at all lectures and workshops is mandatory.

Application forms shall be sent to diver-s-city@uniss.it
Registration submission deadline expires on August 20, 2025

Aims

The construction of international summer school aims at increasing risk awareness of stakeholders, young students, and practitioners across disciplines. Over twenty years, we have developed innovative pedagogies based on a result of our research and practices in the field of disaster mitigation in rural and urban settings to capture the vibe of new generation learning and the social changes. In an international environment, the participants will have a chance to confront and apply different disciplines and approaches to a real case study. The results of the school will enhance the capability of experts, practitioners, and the stakeholders, handling the fragile territory.

Islands at risk // Communities in transition: Montiferru case study

15th International Summer School

Awareness and Responsibility of Environmental Risk

Since its inception in 2008, the summer school has provided a platform for critical engagement with design and environmental risk factors, along with strategies for their management. Through hands-on work on a real-world case study, students are guided and supported by an international, multidisciplinary team of experts and tutors.

The school brings together undergraduate and graduate students from diverse fields - urban design, architecture, planning, engineering, education and learning sciences, geography, geology, sociology, environmental studies, business, and political science - to share their knowledge and ideas on spatial and regional planning.

The school is grounded in the belief that awareness must go hand in hand with knowledge. To analyze, elaborate, reason, decide, and act, knowledge serves as a fundamental scientific prerequisite. Deliberately asking "what, where, why, when, for whom, and how" we design lies at the heart of every meaningful design process.

Case study // Topic

Montiferru, a historical region nestled in central-western Sardinia, Italy, is known for its rugged terrain, rich cultural traditions, and resilient communities spread across six municipalities—Santu Lussurgiu, Bonarcado, Seneghe, Cuglieri, Scano Montiferru, and Sennariolo. Yet beneath this picturesque setting lies a complex web of socio-economic and environmental challenges, driven by a steady trend of rural depopulation.

As local populations decline and age, essential services—such as schools, healthcare, and cultural institutions—have been consolidated or shuttered, weakening the region's social infrastructure. The retreat from agriculture, artisanal work, and local commerce has frayed the economic fabric that once sustained village life. With the erosion of traditional livelihoods comes the parallel loss of intangible heritage and intergenerational knowledge. The environmental consequences are equally pressing. The abandonment of agropastoral systems has led to degraded landscapes, overgrown scrubland, and increasing accumulation of dry vegetation - factors that significantly elevate wildfire risk and hydrogeological vulnerability.

Today, Montiferru stands at a crossroads. Can this region reclaim its vitality through integrated spatial and regional planning?

What models of development can address the intertwined issues of risk, heritage, and sustainability?

And how might new forms of civic participation, cultural innovation, and ecological stewardship offer pathways to regeneration?

This summer school invites participants to explore these questions and propose bold, context-sensitive revitalization strategies for the future of Montiferru.
